Notes For Waterloo Game

Martin Stelmach

February 7, 2018

- The Waterloo Warriors average 93.1 Possessions per game and score roughly 78.2 points per game giving them an average of 0.84 points per possessions

- 21% of the time they simply pull up for a spot up shot. Their main shooters are number 20 and number 15 who take 44% of their spot up shots.

- 70% of the time when number 4 (Simon Petrov) gets the ball, a pick and roll is being ran (and a successful one at that with 79% effectiveness)

- The opposition has a 1.246 points per possession when they get an offensive rebound (ie 64.9% of scoring when they get an offensive rebound)

- number 4 and number 42 have a 52% FGP when playing the transition game, however their back up guard number 6 have a 27% turn over percentage on transition so it is important to play aggressive on him to force the turn over.

- Essentially 50% of the game runs through number 4 and number 42 (no one else even has a comparable FGP per play or a scoring percentage of 30% other than the two who both have an average of 46%)

- 63% of their shots come from behind the 3 point line with a team 27.9% 3 point percentage.

- The real scare is that their shooting percentage between the paint and 3 point line is 40%. This could be deadly if not for the fact that they only shoot around 17% of their shots midrange.

- Defensively this team is very bad at setting up defensively quickly and ultimately results in them not being able to stop the transition. (Did calculation but wasn't sure if it was 26% success rate of stopping the play or 45% but either way thats low and ineffective)

- This team can only defend a cut a shocking 2% of the time!!!! (baseline cut and shoot highly recommended)

- Waterloo's strength lies in its ability to break screens. They break screens roughly 87% of the time which can be dangerous if our players are caught up in their shooting and not paying attention.

- Waterloo's center leads the league in rebounds per game. Boxing him out will be the most crucial aspect of this game.

- No other team member other than number 4 and number 42 averages more than 10 points per game.